

Asian Mycological Congress 2021 (AMC)
3 – 5 August 2022
Thailand Science Park Convention Center, Pathum Thani, Thailand

Rationale

Mycological research in Thailand was established in the early 1900's and thus does not have a long tradition comparable to our European colleagues, but it encompasses a wide range of aspects of interest in Kingdom Fungi. Over the past 50 years, a remarkable advance in fungal research in the region can be seen and is now at the forefront of international mycology. This is testified by the number of international mycologists that visit and work in Thailand, the number of impact publications emanating from the country, by the number of international conferences we have hosted over past 25 years, and by the unique fungal diversity of the principality.

The mycological research community of about 200 active members has representatives in many Thai universities and in various research institutes. Though not very large, it is an active research community and prides itself with high quality research output, mainly in fungal systematics and evolution, fungal host interactions (human, animal and plant), biological control, fungal ecology (terrestrial and marine), mushroom cultivation and medical mycology. Some of the main fungal groups studied in Thailand include endophytic, invertebrate-pathogenic, marine and freshwater, plant-pathogenic, saprobic fungi as well as edible mushrooms.

Thai scientists have always participated in international and Asian mycological congresses, including organizing the IMC10 in Bangkok last August 2014 and the Asian Mycological Congress in Chiang Mai in 2004, the Darwin conference in 2009, as well as yearly national conferences on systematics and biodiversity.
